From the New York Sun GERALD VANE'S LOST ONE.

A STORY OF HEART SLAVERY. BY WALTER SAVAGE NORTH.

Ah! it were hard to battle through a dreary winter, then die at the threshold of the spring; but 'tis bitter, mad'ning, to find the first san-guine hopes of a young heart crushed in the bud; to linger through the dead watches of an almost endless night, dreaming of the coming day; to dote on the little jots of seeming light, and prove them nought but the dim will-owisps fluttering over the black awamps!

It was well on to noon, when I once more stood before the door of Dudley Southland's office in the Lincoln's Inn. There was the busy hum of voices issuing on every side, that smote painfully upon my ear, for it seemed mocking my friendlessness.

When I entered, I found a strange gentle-man scated at the desk. He eyed me deliber-ately through his spectacles for a moment, then motioned me to a seat. "My name is Vane, sir," I ventured, after a momentary silence.

"Vane, Vane!—Ab, yes! Mr. Darkle mentioned you to me this morning. An old friend of Mr. Darkle, I believe."

of Mr. Darkle, I believe."
"We were thrown much together by circumstances, some years ago," I returned.
"Yes, I understand. Well, Mr. Vane, I have considered the application which you made through him"-He paused, as though to watch the effect of his words upon me, then continued: "I need more help. Poor Godfrey—God bless him!" and I thought I could detect a sudden moisture on his cheeks, "poor Godfrey has worked nobly for me, till he is nearly sick; and I have determined, though it will tax my purse rather strongly, to lift the burthen partly from his shoulders, and"— At this moment the door opened, and Mr.

Darkle walked slowly in. He looked even paler than on the previous night, and the slight exertion of ascending the stairs, seemed to have bereft him of strength, for he leaned heavily upon the door-knob for support, and caught his breath tremulously. "What, down again?" asked Mr. Southland, with an expression half of alarm and surprise. "You will kill yourself! Do go home and rest yourself."

Godfrey Darkle shook his head mournfully "I am quite fresh again," he answered with a sad smile. "The fresh air has revived me, and now, when the fatigue of walking has passed off, I shall be as well as ever."

Dudley Southland averted his face, and for a moment rested his brow upon his hand, and when once more he turned towards his clerk, the traces of some sickening pain were yet visible upon his features.

"I am happy to see you to-day," said God-frey, extending me his hand. "I suppose, Mr. Southland, you are already aware that this is Mr. Vane.

"I was just speaking concerning his applica-tion when you entered. Sit down, and we three will canvass the matter. I understand, Mr. Vane, that Mr. Darkle has informed you that I have met with unfortunate reverses in my business. I was wealthy, but now in my old age,
I find myself almost penniless. It would, however, matter but little to me, were I alone in the world, with no one to struggle for but myself; but I have a child dependent upon me for support. To shield her from want is now my chief care. Thanks to the noble heart of Godfrey Darkle, thus far, I have been enabled to earn a livelihood; but without him"-

"Don't speak so, Mr. Southland," interrupted the young man. "You it is who have befriended me.

"You see how it is, Mr. Vane," said the old gentleman, with a smile of pleasure, "Mr. gentleman, with a smile of pleasure, "Mr. Darkle will not even accept the poor compensation of my thanks. But once more to business! If £50 this first year, is any inducement, Mr. Vane, I should be most happy to take you into my employ. "It shames me," he added, in a lower tone, "to offer you so small a sum, but under the existing circumstances, I really am unable to name anything above that, at least for the present."

A poor crumb is a godsend to a hangry beggar, and with a profusion of thanks, I accepted the offer.

"The labor," continued Mr. Southland, "will not be arduous, for there is another young gen-tleman whom I propose taking into my employ, or rather whose father proposes taking me into employ—I have the letter which I received from him this morning. He is an old friend of mine, living at his country-seat in Devonshire; and a companion of my better days—I will read it you!"

And, taking a folded paper from his pocket, he advanced to the window, and by the dim light which forced its difficult way in through the dirty panes, commenced reading aloud:

"Golding Hall, Devonshire.
ESTREMED FRIEND:—Since his late visit to London, and tax upon your hospitality, my son Arthur,"— A quick exclamation from Godfrey Darkle, startled me, and when I glanced towards him, his dark eye was strangely kindled, and his thin fingers were working nervously together. nervously together.

Dudley Southland heard it not, and continued reading:
——"has been selzed with an unconquerable desire to spend some months, perhaps a year, in tuition of the law. If you should have any vacancy or prospect of such, in your office, please communicate immediately. If agreeable, it would please me much, if matters might be so arranged as to permit him to make his residence with you. With kind regards, Yours to command, GROFFRRY GOLDING." The old gentleman looked at Mr. Darkle with a smile of askance; but the young man was silent, statue-like, save as his bloodless lips moved convulsively, as though they fain would give utterance to thoughts which bubbled wildy from his brain, but were crushed back again y an iron will. Mr. Southland stood for a moment with his eyes fixed upon the pale face of Godfrey, then walked slowly forward, and laid his hand upon his shoulder.

"Mr. Darkle," he asked, "what is the matar. Darke, he asked, "what is the matter? Something has touched you! I request, yes, demand a reply."
"Nothing, nothing!" returned the other quickly, passing his fingers across his brow,
"only a sudden pain here. It will be gone in a moment more."
The larger thread compliant in the

The lawyer glanced commiseratingly at him ; then turning to me: "Mr. Vane," he remarked, "you being one of us now, allow me to request your opinion as to my better mode of action. Would you in my case comply with the request, or would you not?"

you not?"
"Most assuredly," I answered. "He may prove valuable aid, and the contingent expenses will be nothing." "I am glad you agree with me. Now, my dear friend Darkle, may I beg your opinion?"
"What is a beggar's opinion, when weighed in the balance with the desire of a Crossus?" he replied with a gloomy bitterness, that start-jed us both. "Work your own will, Mr. South- wholming.

land, 'tis not for a pauper to canvass the merits or demerits of such a case as this. You know your own mind, sir; set upon its dictates, and you make sure of pleasing one, at least. You can't gratify the whim of every one in the world."

"You talk strangely to-day. What has hap-

"You talk strangely to-day. What has happened?"
"Nothing ever happens to the chaff thrust out of the paupers' home. There is but one path of misery for him, no chance, no mayhap, but a settled walk of—of madness and despair, maybe. Nothing has happened, Mr. Southland."

"Then," continued the other, musingly, "as no one objects, I will immediately communicate to Devonshire"—

But before he could conclude the sentence, Godfrey Darkle leaped to his feet, and bent in an almost threatening attitude above him. "Dudley Southland," he muttered flercely, "I have labored for you, for two long years; toiled and prayed for you. From day to day, from night to night, I have dragged out a weary existence, that you and your child might be shielded from the horrors of destitution. What matter if / died? It would have been but a matter if I died? It would have been out a little dull echo of the falling sod—you would have been happy, and the world would not have missed me. I will labor still, if needs, till my fingers are worked to the bone, till my very brain goes wild; but the moment that Arthur Golding sets foot across this threshold—Dudley Southland, I swear it!—that thenceforth"—
"Godfrey, Godfrey!" I cried, laying hold of him, "be calm. You know not what you say. Some excitement has unmanned you."

For a moment he struggled fiercely in grasp; then, as remembering himself, allowed me to lead him back to his seat. "Forgive me, Mr. Southland!" he said, after

"Torgive me, Mr. Southball the sale, all a short pause, "forgive me."

"I have nothing to forgive, my dear boy," replied the old gentleman kindly. "I owe you too much already. I will write a firm re-"Excuse me sir," interrupted Mr. Darkle, 'but do not attach importance to words uttered in a moment of indiscretion. Gratify Mr. Golding by all means. Since you have wished an opinion, I now offer one." "Then you have no objection?"

I watched Godfrey Darkle's countenance, and saw the quick flush that mounted to his temples. "None!" he answered firmly, but the word was forced, and I thought I could detect an expression of shame in the feverish brilliancy of his dark eyes as they met mine, for an in-stant, then wandered vacantly to the floor.

"I could conceive no possible reason for any antagonism on your part," continued Mr. Southland. "You never met Arthur but once, and could have had no opportunity to find out any trait in his character which should inspire with dislike."

you with dislike."
"True," he replied calmly, "and—but we'll not speak farther of the matter. I shall proceed with the copy of the minutes of the Chancery suit of Barlow vs. Barlow as for Mr. "He can assist you as you think proper. But don't fatigue yourself with any more night work; you'll kill yourself if you do. I will step home for a moment, then attend to the case in hand before the King's Bench. Good day, Mr. Darkle! Mr. Vane, I bid you good And taking up his hat he hurrled out. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

BATTLES OF THE FIRST NAPOLEON .-- A COT respondent of the London Times contrasts the loss of life at the battle of Magenta with that of some of the battles of the first Napoleon: At Marengo, of which M. Thiers says, General Bonaparte staked his whole fortune on that day," the Austrian loss was 8,000 killed and wounded, and 4,000 prisoners; the French 6,000, and 1,000 prisoners; according to other accounts, 7,000 killed and wounded on each side. But eight standards and twenty pieces of cannon were taken by the French while the other results were, the complete reconquest of Piedmont and of the Milanese, the cession of 12 fortresses with 1.500 pieces of cannon, and the advance of the French to the

At the great battle of Austerlitz, the battle At the great battle of Austerlitz, the battle of Emperors, when three were in the field, the Austrians lost 15,000 killed, wounded, and drowned, 20,000 prisoners, 180 guns: the French, according to M. Thiers, "about 7,000." The conditions imposed by Napoleon were the Venetlan States to complete the kingdom of Italy, the Tyrol and Austrian Suabia to aggrandize Bavaria, the duchies of Baden and Wurtemberg: family alliances with the German houses, 100,000,000 in money, in addition to the loss of territory; and the rupture of the third coalition was the immediate consequence. Moreover, there were captured in the field 40 Austrian standards, those of the Imperial Guard of Russia, and among the prisoners were 29 general officers.

The total loss of the whole allied troops engaged at Waterloo was 22,378 killed, wounded, and mission.

and missing. STREET RAILWAYS.—As the lumbering old fashioned stage coach for long journeys, has been superceded by the dashing locomotive with its train of gay and cosy care, so is the omnibus upon our streets likely to find itself giving place to the Street Railway care. Street Railways have been some years in use, and are an excellent institution in the Eastern cities, and they are rapidly growing in favor now in the West. Cincinnati is about adopting them through all her prominent thosughfares, while other cities are making arrangefares, while other cities are making arrangements to follow her enterprising example That the Street Railway is an improvement worthy of the age on the rough jolting omnibus, which roasts its passengers in summer, freezes them in winter, and squeezes them to death from its gluttonous propensities, all the time we presume will be admitted. Why therefore companies should not be formed to bring them into use in all cities where they are needed, we cannot perceive. And in this connection, we know of no place which so needs an arrangement of this kind more than Wheeling, and we should be pleased to hear of such an enterprise being set on foot.—Wheeling Times. Will our Council take note? PROGRESS IN ST. Louis .- The Olive street Railroad is being rapidly pushed along west-ward of Twelfth street. This side of Twelfth street the track is complete to Fourth street, with the exception of setting the stone on edge, required by the charter, immediately outside the rails. It will take but a few days to complete the road. A Milan letter, from M. Dreolle, in the Constitutional, says that the Austrians had, at the time of their departure, specie to the value of eight or ten millions of francs, but that the sun found on the arrival of the French troops did not exceed 800,000f. or 1,000,000f. Some letters suggest that the treasury was sacked by the populace, but M. Dreelle thinks that the Austrians took most of their money away. The only wonder is that they should have left any behind them.

The miners are leaving Frasor River in large numbers, declaring that the mines there are worked out and have no future. The value of property in Viotoria has fallen greatly, and many of the houses built within the last years are vacant. It is admitted now that British Columbia must derive all, or nearly all its immigrants from England and Scotland.

There is no place like California for women who can take care of themselves. The Yreka Union says there are only about fifty unmarried ladies over twelve years of age in Siskiyou county, which contains probably a population of 10,000. If Mr. Robert Bonner, editor and proprietor of the Ledger, has a weakness, it is for a first-rate borse. He has just bought the famous trotter Lantern, with his mate. The price paid is not known; some say it is $10,000, and oth-ers $9,500. A blacksmith named Orland B. Merrill has been arrested at East Boston, on the monstrons charge of attempted outrage on the person of his own daughter, only 13 years of age. The evidence against the prisoner is said to be overMISCELLANEOUS.
